While standing in this silent attitude, I suppose we were observed by them; for my father, immediately changing the course of his walk, joined us in the road, and, without the least embarrassment, presented to us his fair companion as the daughter of a lady whom he much respected, and should be happy to see numbered among our most intimate friends, and who, from her own peculiar merit, was deserving of our esteem. There needed no other recommendation; it was sufficient, to me, that my father judged her a proper companion; and, the natural sociality of my temper prevailing over ceremony, we soon became as chatty as if we had long known each other. But my aunt, who had seen more of the world, and had my interest much at heart, looked upon this affair in a -very different light,...
