This aspect of the freedman's life has been touched upon by various modern authorities while dealing with other matters; but no complete treatment of the subject, which follows the method here attempted, is known to me. Rome was a state in which slavery was, from first to last, an established institution. Under such conditions, the social standing of any freedman may, in a general way, be taken for granted. The influence of race, of character, of ability, would at best be slight; and traces of them wherever they occurred, would call for careful examination. Social position is not necessarily affected by civic rights. For that reason those aspects of the bondsman's life, (to which many scholars have already devoted their...
