Excerpt: . . . proposed to establish a board of conciliation composed equally of directors of the companies and employees, for consideration of matters in dispute with an appeal to arbitration whenever the trouble could not be settled by the board. This agreement was signed by all the representatives of both parties, and on November 7 the nation received the welcome news that there would be no strike. The agreement is terminable by a years notice at the end of six years. The settlement, which is regarded as establishing LloydGeorges reputation for tact and diplomacy, involves concessions by both sides. The companies are able to claim that they have not yielded to the demand for recognition of the union, but at the same time they bind themselves to compulsory outside intervention in disputes with their employees. Both sides profess satisfaction with the result. The president of the board...
