A quantity of gas admitted into an empty closed space spreads itself almost instantly throughout the space. The distribution of the substance is very nearly uniform. When a very large quantity of an easily condensable gas is forced under pressure into a limited space, a portion of the gas may be liquefied, and the substance will then be seen to be separated in the vessel into two parts. One of these has the ordinary characteristic appearance of a liquid; and the other is lighter and gaseous, and occupies the upper part of the vessel. In this case, however, the gaseous part of the substance is not properly termed gas, but should rather be termed steam of the liquid beneath. 49. Weight of Gases.--This property is so little obvious to our senses, that gases were long considered to be weightless. It is easy, however, to arrange an experiment to show that gases have weight; and the weights and densities of the various gases have been very carefully determined. For this purpose a thin glass globe is used, furnished with a perfectly air-tight stop-cock, which is attached to the globe by a brass mounting cemented to the neck of the globe. The brass mounting is provided with a hook, by means of which the globe can be hung from the specific gravity pan of the...
